University of Malaya, Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia

In January 2012, Taiwan held the presidential and legislative yuan elections. Taiwan has again lived up to the name as one of the most vibrant democracies in Asia. Beginning in the 1990s, Taiwan has indeed successfully undergone democratic transformation and consolidation, all the while maintaining economic prosperity and playing a constructive role in the international arena. Taiwan is also among the freest societies in the Chinese world. The experience of Taiwan's democracy indeed should be examined and studied in details. The performance of President Ma's administration in the past five years, the changes and continuities of cross-strait relations, President Ma's foreign policy, campaign strategies of the main political parties in these elections, the patterns of political landscape in Taiwan, the voting behavior of the electorate, the prospects of the upcoming local elections in 2014, the future direction of the Democratic Progressive Party, and analyses of the re-elected Kuomintang government, including its prospective Mainland policy, cabinet team, the next echelon of leadership, and others, are some of the topics that this conference wishes to illuminate. Taiwan's elections will be closely watched by policymakers in Seoul, Washington, Beijing, Tokyo, and even in capitals of ASEAN countries. The electoral results do have significant political and strategic implications in the region and beyond. On a more theoretical note, how Taiwan's experiences serve to confirm, modify, or challenge prevailing theories of democracy and democratization, and how such lessons serve to give us insights into the political dynamics in other similar democratically transitioning systems, are also highly relevant. Also, the reelection of the Kuomintang Party's presidential candidate and the continuous domination of the legislature by the Kuomintang could be seen as part of the interesting phenomenon of the "coming back" of the dominant party with authoritarian past in competitive systems in East Asia. During the past few years, a number of East Asian developmental states had undergone democratic elections, and all of them had seen the old conservative dominant parties doing well in polls. Japan's Liberal Democratic Party was returned to power only after four years in opposition, while Korea's Saenuri Party continued the conservative ascendance in the country. In semi-competitive systems, Singapore's People's Action Party and Malaysia's Barisan Nasional also withstood strong opposition challenges. The endurance of the conservative dominant parties, many of them are associated with illiberal features but also credited with engineering the economic successes of the "developmental state", will also be explored from a comparative perspective in this conference, particularly using Malaysia and its recent electoral experiences as a comparative case study.

International Conference*"China-ASEAN Regional Integration: Political Economy of Trade, Growth and Investment"

Jointly organized by

and
Institute of Malaysian Studies, Xiamen University

14-15 October 2008*Venue: Auditorium, Institute of Postgraduate Studies, University of Malaya

The Institute of China Studies, University of Malaya, in collaboration with the Institute of Malaysian Studies, Xiamen University, is organizing an international conference "China-ASEAN Regional Integration: Political Economy of Trade, Growth and Investment" on 14-15 October 2008. Like the rest of the world, interest in negotiating trade arrangements has increased in the East Asian region. For instance, the Republic of Korea, China and Japan have linked up with ASEAN, to create the ASEAN+3 grouping through the Chiang Mai Initiative to enhance stability in the Asian economy. With the changing global trade patterns and proliferation of preferential trading agreements (PTAs), a small open economy like Malaysia is set to see changes in its international trade partners. In the past, the United States of America (US), Japan, and the European Union (EU) have been the major trading partners of Malaysia. However, with rapid economic growth, the emerging and transforming economic entities in East Asia, China in particular, are going to become more integrated, through trade and capital flows, with other East Asian countries, including Malaysia. As China is anticipated to sustain relatively high growth rates in the foreseeable future, Malaysia is positioning itself to take advantage of the growth opportunities. This could explain Malaysia's enthusiasm in getting actively involved in negotiations with the other ASEAN members to sign the ACFTA agreement with China not only to promote an increase in intra-regional trade but also to enhance market integration. Malaysia sees the FTA in terms of substantial potential gains through competition and scale effects, which could be used strategically to serve the growth objective. However, positive outcomes are only possible with careful policy design including detailed consideration of the implications of the agreement, identification of the readiness of the industries for liberalization and market access opportunities in partner countries, and ensuring effective enforcement mechanisms. On the part of China, it is obvious that it now sees FTAs as a crucial means to enhance economic development through expanding market size and establishing market coordination mechanisms to improve the investment environment and attract more investments from outside the region. This is in line with Beijing's need to guarantee the supply of energy and raw material from ASEAN and to help diversifying export markets. The formation of ACFTA and the recently proposed Pan-Beibu Gulf cooperation has the potential to further increase Malaysia's investment opportunity in China with both sides having entered into negotiations in order to progressively liberalize the investment regime. China's large market, abundant human resource and low production cost in combination may provide great opportunities for Malaysian firms to invest there. On the other hand, it should be noted that the formation of ACFTA and the Pan-Beibu Gulf proposal could also create challenges for Malaysia, one of which is the fact that the labour force in China being undeniably huge compared to ASEAN-5, hence giving China a definite advantage in the labour-intensive sectors. It is thus within such context of regional trade and integration that this international conference is set to discuss in depth the intricate nexus of growth, trade and investment between China and Malaysia as well as its other trading partners in ASEAN.
